.Flash_ gives designers the ability to build Photoshop-style complex animated images. Flash is supported by some of the most popular websites on the Internet. ## Adobe Illustrator Adobe Illustrator is a vector-based drawing program, a godsend for people who think in blocks, lines, and curves. It can save images as SVG files, making it easier for sites that can't support CSS, as well as Flash and Flash-based applications. Adobe Illustrator has been around since the 1990s, and was originally known as Adobe Design. It was a separate program from Photoshop until the release of Adobe Creative Suite 3 in 2007. Adobe Illustrator can easily be used to create any sort of print or Web design and is a faster and more efficient alternative to Adobe Photoshop. The program used to require an extensive amount of training to use; however, Adobe has done a phenomenal job of producing books and online tutorials that can help beginners get up to speed quickly. ## CorelDRAW CorelDRAW is an illustrator-style vector-based drawing program. It also happens to be the world's oldest vector graphics application. CorelDRAW is generally used by print designers, and is probably the most popular program for printing graphics in black and white and color. Its range of features is excellent, and what's more, the company has been putting out new features quite frequently to keep their customers up to speed with the latest trends in graphic design. ## GIMP GIMP is a free open source image manipulation program. It's a lot like Photoshop in that it has a somewhat heavy learning curve, but then so does Photoshop. GIMP is quite good for beginners but also has some limitations, including a lack of automatic image processing and a limited set of powerful filters. GIMP is a great program for beginners who want to learn how to edit images in order to make them more creative and to improve the quality. There are also a lot of online tutorials to help you get started. ## Adobe Fireworks Adobe Fireworks is a newer, less robust but very versatile alternative to the Adobe suite of applications. It is, in many ways, a less powerful version of Illustrator. It's a vector-based illustration program, and generally can't be used as much as Illustrator to create print designs. Fireworks is very popular for Web designers, but it doesn't hold a candle to

I have found on line a bunch of views, but I was hoping to get some actual first-hand accounts from people who have used this device. Just some background on how I found this idea and what I am looking for. In 1980 or 1981, I had an unused beta case, later used as an 8 inch standup cello. It had dried on it a couple of stickers of about 50 years worth of 45 records. The case I had was black and had a cover painted white and was stenciled with the phrase "In Memory of The Father of Rock and Roll". I bought it for like 20 bucks from some guy, who must've been in the building supply business. It was a little old and it had a zipper and a pleather lining and kind of a wobbly bottom but was in great shape. It only had a few scratches and the vinyl was in the top and bottom positions. I actually had a black 4 and had the same stenciling. I knew a couple of people who were into 45's at the time and they thought the case I had was cool, so I sold it. I now have a beta-case but it is a yellow and seems to have a different top and bottom set up. I found an album cover with a recording on a wall of a house in the france. It was a wall that had a lot of record cases on it. From the album cover and it looks like the record was by The Louisiana Hayride. Is anyone else familiar with a record cover I found that I have not seen? I found a beta case used on a wall. It was on a wall in a store in Holland. The wall had a lot of record covers. From the record cover I can tell it is a 45 rpm record. The cover has the words "The Louisiana Hayride " above it and the words "The Louisiana Hayride" below it. I looked for a sticker on the cover, but was not successful. Any information on the record would be appreciated. I found a beta case used on a wall. It was

Development and validation of the self-efficacy in palliative care scale. In palliative care, patients and family caregivers sometimes experience high levels of stress and psychosocial burden. The purpose of this study was to develop and validate a scale to measure patients' and family caregivers' level of self-efficacy in palliative care. As part of a prospective study, a scale with a total of 50 items (14 items for patients and 36 items for family caregivers) was developed and evaluated. After a pilot-study, an initial version of the scale was tested for internal consistency and reliability and then completed by 421 patients and 439 family caregivers of patients with a life expectancy of 6 months or less. Reliability was tested by Cronbach's alpha coefficients and test-retest reliability by the Intra-Class Correlation (ICC). The mean scores for patients and caregivers were  $14.03 \pm 4.51$  and  $38.96 \pm 9.43$ , respectively. The reliability of the scale was acceptable (Cronbach's  $\alpha$  of 0.749 for patients and of 0.877 for caregivers), and good inter-rater reliability for patients and family caregivers was found (ICC = 0.744 and 0.893, respectively). Both self-efficacy for patients and family caregivers correlated with each other and with the scores on the main scales, but not with important socio-demographic variables. The self-efficacy in palliative care scale is a reliable instrument to measure self-efficacy in palliative care that can be used for other palliative care populations.Q: Dynamically modify colgroup for N tables I'm working on a web page in which a user can filter the results of a table. I have a list of topics of which they can select those they want to include. The code I'm using to generate the table headers is: var selector = \$('#selector')[0]; var selectorList = selector.options[selector.selectedIndex].value; var rowCount = \$('#storeTable tr').length; \$('#storeTable').children('thead').children('th').remove(); for (var i=0; i < selectorList.length; i++)
