Monitor every action performed on a computer without requiring further work! Windows 10 features the following features: - Improved privacy options and Windows Defender - Cortana with Cortana Now - Windows Ink - Windows Ink for touch - New app experience and universal apps Since the dawn of the Internet, it has become a common practice for people to share videos or links to videos to their friends, friends of friends and eventually people unknown. The danger of this is the potential of being exposed to pornographic or otherwise inappropriate videos, which can happen in the blink of an eye. Some say it happens very often. In such a scenario, should you or your friends in school or work ever come across porn or other objectionable videos? What if you come across such content in a sharing link or in your email? How do you know who has seen it? Cyber court Germans, in particular, are not free from these kinds of issues. Earlier this month, the court in Munich delivered a verdict on a criminal case where two defendants were accused of sharing porn on the social network. The verdict was made after the complainant noted that he came across a link to a clip of a porno online that his then-girlfriend had shared in May 2014. Apparently, the piece of content was deleted immediately upon being detected, but that did not prevent the individual from being identified. Both of the defendants were acquitted, and it remains to be seen whether the judgment will have any impact on other similar cases that are still pending. Tips - Do not ask for anything personal or sensitive from your friends. If you do so, you can lose them as a friend. - If you're in need of advice, ask for it from a third person. - Avoid sending emails in the middle of the night. - Never save the email as a draft, or send a message via another account. - Store your shared files and links in the cloud. Cyber-attacks, all too often, cause an unimaginable level of damage, and one of the worst examples of this is the case of the recent ransomware outbreak that resulted in the WannaCry incident. Aside from being a threat to your network security, a ransomware attack has the potential to put a huge damper on your business, and in worst-case scenarios, it could even make you lose your entire network. In an email sent by the Russian government earlier this month, they advised businesses to be on the lookout for Trojan
