Resonant energy may be used for any of a variety of applications, including, but not limited to, ablation, incision, and hemostasis. Such applications may be performed using any suitable resonant energy source or device, including those disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 6,254,598, the entirety of which is incorporated herein by reference. For example, a resistor device may be placed adjacent to a tissue site, and a radio frequency (RF) electrical current may be applied to the device in order to generate heat or thermal energy that is transferred to the tissue site. Applicators for use with resonant energy devices may include, for example, a surface mount electrode and a lead connector. The surface mount electrode is adapted for surface contact with a patient's tissue at or adjacent to a tissue site on which energy is to be delivered. The lead connector may be used to connect the surface mount electrode to a resonant energy device. The lead connector may include, for example, a cable for carrying radio frequency current to the electrode, along with a plug for connecting the cable to the resonant energy device. The lead connector may be removably coupled to the resonant energy device and/or the surface mount electrode, and may be easily and easily removed from the resonant energy device and/or the surface mount electrode, allowing the resonant energy device to be conveniently replaced in the event of damage to the resonant energy device.Reference intervals for serum electrolytes and albumin in a stable population of adult horses in Spain. To determine the reference intervals of biochemical profiles in blood serum of adult horses from a population of the Castilla y León, Spain. Samples of blood serum were collected from 430 adult horses submitted to veterinary clinics in Castilla y León, Spain and analysed for Na+, K+, Cl-, phosphorus, total protein, urea, albumin, glucose and creatine phosphokinase (CPK) levels. Blood samples were obtained from horses of various breeds and ages and clinical diagnoses and owners' history was recorded. The reference intervals for serum electrolytes were considerably lower than those previously reported in horses. Males and geldings had significantly higher values for Cl- and phosphorous than mares or stallions. The reference intervals reported here will help interpret laboratory results of the total equine population.Mitochondrial genome of the North 570a42141b
