Christopher Harris and other experts in the field. If you try it and experience problems, please be sure to tweet at us with an explanation of what happened. Microsoft will be providing a free email client for users of its Windows Live service by the end of next year. The announcement comes after Google revealed a beta version of its Gmail interface for Windows just recently. [Microsoft Nails Google on Email, Windows, Google Reader] Google announced on Wednesday that Gmail accounts have joined Windows Live as a new client. The service will provide a web-based interface to your inbox, as well as an IMAP support for applications like Thunderbird and Apple's Mail. It will also eventually support POP3 and SMTP access. [Gmail for Windows Live] Nearly a year ago, Google announced its OpenSocial service and began beta testing it, but the company has yet to launch. The service is currently available only for a small group of people. There's one problem that Google is having with the service. Users have reported that they are being redirected to various other "OpenSocial" services by Internet service providers. [Google's OpenSocial Beta Is Suffering from Redirect Issues] Google will be launching a Web-based
