The past few years have seen the rapid development of battery technology. More and more Li-ion batteries are produced, with larger capacities being produced and increasing power outputs. This makes it possible to use electric vehicles and various electronic devices powered by Li-ion batteries. However, as the battery technology continues to advance, the lifespan of the batteries becomes shorter. Research has shown that the active material degradation is a major factor leading to the short lifespan of lithium batteries. This active material degradation is related to the large amount of Li in the battery. As more and more lithium ions are released, the lithium ions will react with the electrolytes to form solid electrolyte interphase (SEI) which is non-conductive, and thus reduces the conductivity of
