I tend to use a commercial method which I have found to be effective - until now - in removing chemicals from the surface. There are three different chemicals that I apply first, and after each cycle, I go back over the surface with a clean towel. I only do it once.

While the method I am about to share works well, it is a little labor intensive. May 1, 2018 (03-21-2011, 04:56 PM)Valentina Wrote: For removing solids, fine-grain sand is often used. The sand is allowed to dry, then the backside is wiped smooth. The sand is then crushed into small particles and allowed to air-dry completely. Also, I see that commercial kits have something similar to active charcoal. How to produce the complete set of permeability data for compound-specific tracers. Compound-specific isotope analysis (CSIA) is being increasingly applied to environmental samples, thus requiring accurate measurements of all endogenous tracer mass isotopologues. Permeability measurements or their equivalent are a key step in the quantitative determination of CSIA inputs. Most previous works on the application of in situ gas permeability to groundwater tracer measurements used simplified equations to estimate permeability at the conditions of analysis.

The aim of this work was to develop a complete workflow to produce accurate in situ gas permeability values at different temperatures and pressures, in scenarios with high tracer overlap and unknown temperatures. The workflow takes advantage of the slopes and intercepts of simple linear equations to predict permeability from tracer concentrations. The application of the method to the recovery and permeability of total dissolved sulfate after an equilibration period of 200 days is presented. The permeability measurements of sulfate after equilibrium were measured using three different approaches: direct tracer equilibrium, dynamic tracer mass balance, and a
