At a time when healthcare is seen to be an area of special concern (with the UK health service struggling with access to doctors), it seems that it has become a focus for companies, as the government grapples with a funding crisis that threatens to leave hospitals unable to continue providing services. A recent report from the University of Edinburgh found that nearly half of the biggest employers in the UK are using the NHS as their front-line supplier, employing more than two million staff. At the same time, providers are expected to see their performance in the areas they are charged with improving — such as clinical outcomes and patient safety — decline. If the reforms do not come soon, the NHS will have to do more with less, and will ultimately end up worse off than when they began. However, it appears that politicians are becoming more enlightened, and are willing to step back. This is down to the £20 million bill from Facebook, but also to the efforts of organisations like Techland which has raised over a million pounds in the 12 hours since its campaign began, allowing hundreds of hospitals and care homes to continue providing care to those who need it. You can check out the campaign here, and make sure you add your name to the petition before time runs out. Update: There are also updates as new hospitals – such as North Tees in Hartlepool – pledge to make use of the service as well. This would mean the greatest number of patients in the NHS since its inception would receive treatment. Wednesday, September 21, 2012 All About Letting Go I am a firm believer in letting go. Without holding on to anything in life, it is all too easy to fall into a pattern. The desire to hold on to certain things may be a good thing but if we let go of certain things and allow ourselves to flow without resistance, we start to feel lighter and freer. I try to make time for this. At night I will pray a certain prayer in Japanese and then just say my goodnight. No need to go to bed with all the
