The effects of starvation during pregnancy on cardiovascular function and fetal-placental blood flow in the sheep. The effects of fasting during late gestation (days 120-130) on the cardiovascular function, fetal blood flow and placental blood flow in chronically catheterized, unanesthetized, pregnant sheep were studied. Six control animals were fed their usual ration ad libitum throughout gestation, and six starved animals were fasted on days 120-130. After each animal was killed, a placental and fetal circulatory unit was dissected and physiologic properties of the placental and fetal circulations were studied. The cats in the fed and starved groups had similar values for maternal arterial blood pressure, maternal cardiac output, fetal arterial blood pressure, fetal cardiac output, fetal heart rate, and uterine blood flow. Fasting had no effect on fetal blood flow or placental blood flow and oxygen delivery. Fetal oxygen consumption and the oxygen extraction ratio of the placenta were significantly decreased in the starved groups. The placental and fetal oxygen extraction were correlated with fetal blood flow in both the fed and starved groups. Fetal oxygen consumption in the fed group correlated with placental blood flow whereas in the starved group fetal oxygen consumption was independent of placental blood flow. We concluded that from 120-130 days of gestation maternal nutrition significantly affects the placental and fetal circulations, as determined by the fetal oxygen consumption and oxygen extraction ratio of the placenta and the fetal blood flow. Cytogenetic investigations in a patient with a 14 months history of multiple myeloma and myelofibrosis. In a 53-year-old woman with a 14 months history of multiple myeloma (MM), the cytogenetic investigation revealed an i(17q)-symmetrical, rearranged chromosome 17. This cytogenetic finding and a simultaneous myelofibrosis may have been related to a high grade of myeloma (marked hypercellular bone marrow) with proliferation of plasmacytes, lymphocytes and megakaryocytes. The cytogenetic and clinical status of the patient was consistent with the prognosis of myeloma. Brenda Correa Brenda Correa, (born March 18, 1956) is a Canadian actress.
