INTRODUCTION {#rjx221s1} ============ The above image shows a bilateral iliacus extrauterine mass in a 43-year-old female. On presentation, she complained of dull, constant pain for six months which was refractory to all analgesics. On examination, the mass was obstructing the right common iliac vein and was impalpable on rectal examination. The mass resolved spontaneously following reduction of the large size after three months of intermittent ultrasound guidance. We describe this rare presentation of an extrauterine iliacus hernia, which is a true extraperitoneal hernia in which the peritoneum of the urinary bladder has detached from the wall. Whilst most iliac hernias arise from the infra-umbilical region, this case arose from the muscle of the thigh. CASE REPORT {#rjx221s2} =========== A 43-year-old female presented with a two-year history of severe right-sided flank pain. She was not aware of any previous trauma. Her presentation was complicated by urinary retention, renal colic and a stone passed via the urethra. There was no dysuria or frequency. The patient had lost weight and showed signs of right-sided renal disease. An ultrasound examination showed a right-sided retroperitoneal heterogeneous mass of variable echogenicity. It was associated with a large right common iliac vein thrombosis. The mass was not associated with calcification. The patient was taken for an MRI scan, which confirmed the large right iliac mass and showed an 'egg-shell' appearance with an intact wall in most of the regions of the mass (Fig. 1{ref-type="fig"}). This finding was not found to be in favour of a malignancy. ![Diagram showing the appearance of the right extraperitoneal iliacus hernia.
