Description of Related Art The individual turbine blades in a turbine engine typically include a root portion adapted to be secured to an external casing of the turbine engine, a platform and a generally airfoil extending radially outwardly from the platform, and tip portions terminating in radially outermost tips of the turbine blade. Over the last several decades, as the dimensions of turbine engines have been reduced, air is increasingly channeled through the turbine engine by way of the leading edges of the turbine blade tips. However, as air is channeled through the engine, hot combustion gas streams cause thermal and mechanical damage to the tip portion of the blade. To alleviate such damage, the leading edge of the turbine blade is typically cooled by directing a high-pressure flow of air across the leading edge of the blade tip to thereby cool the blade. Further, such cooling is typically provided by discharging a portion of high-pressure air to the blade tip through one or more cooling holes. Cooling holes may be formed by drilling the turbine blade tip with an appropriate drill bit, such as a drill bit having an array of cooling holes formed therein. Cooling holes may be un-gated or gated to improve cooling efficiency and effectiveness. An exemplary un-gated hole is shown in FIG. 10 of U.S. Pat. No. 3,313,850. An exemplary gated hole is shown in FIG. 11 of U.S. Pat. No. 3,313,850. However, it has been observed that if the cooling holes are too big, air velocity through the cooling holes is reduced, and the efficiency of cooling is correspondingly reduced. If, however,
