FIFA is the most popular football game on the planet. Created by EA Canada and published by EA in North America, it's official license is the property of FIFA. The ultimate goal of the game is to control a single club in the real-life football league system of the time in question. The players, the stadiums, the set-up of the teams - it's all there. The control of the football league is achieved through a series of realistic official competitions. All the national and international matches, as well as the FA Cup, League Cup, Champions League and Europa League are all part of FIFA's football universe. True to the FIFA essence - this is not a "How to play football" game. Football is controlled by team tactics and formations. Everything else around the football world - from managing finances, social media connections, sponsorship deals, media relations and club relationships can be influenced. The year-to-year football updates that we enjoy are possible with FIFA, but only with our real-life licenses. FIFA's gameplay is essentially based on the current rules. The ball can not be moved by the player, but by the gravity force in the game. Without going into too much detail, FIFA's gameplay is hard and fast. Ball control and player speed are the most important attributes that make a FIFA player. The faster you move the ball, the higher chance you have to score a goal. There are so many different situations for a player to react to. Your approach to the game will be completely based on how you learn FIFA and understand the small details of football. The biggest difference between FIFA and real football is that FIFA players don't get tackled. The player is controlled with the analogue stick and can use the D-pad to move. There are several items that can be used in the game. These include the forward and backwards buttons, shoulder buttons (allowing you to shoot the ball and perform other actions) and the quick buttons on the options menu. The selection of the player's performance attributes (speed, strength, coordination, reactions, etc.) can be set before each match. In FIFA, you are in charge of a single football club. In order to do that, a free agent is required. Footballers from around the world can be acquired by training on the pitch or buying for real-life money. Your players will earn experience and develop. Up to 40 different attributes can be worked on, each individual attribute with its own level. The attributes that you will
