In its most common form, polyethylene glycol can be prepared using a random or a linear polymerization method. In the random polymerization method, ethylene oxide (EO) is reacted with an initiator such as an alkali metal hydroxide or alcoholate. As described in more detail in EP 775,542, polyethylene glycol can also be prepared through a linear method. In this method, a mixture of a difunctional or polyfunctional initiator compound and a compound containing both EO and an activated hydrogen is polymerized to produce a linear polymer with a polyethylene glycol (PEG) end. Common initiator compounds used for preparing linear PEGs include aliphatic alcohols such as ethylene glycol, trimethylene glycol, propylene glycol, butylene glycol, hexylene glycol, octene glycol and the like; cyclic diols such as glycerol and trimethylene glycol; and inorganic oxy acids such as H2O2. The linear PEGs are known to have generally lower viscosity than their random counterparts, but are very difficult to characterize in terms of molecular weight. In contrast, the random PEGs produced by the random polymerization method are relatively easy to characterize because they are characterized by a narrow distribution of molecular weights. The polyethylene glycols are often used as solubilizing agents in pharmaceutical compositions and other applications where aqueous solubility is an issue. This is particularly true for intravenously administered applications where the solubility of the polymer is an important consideration. In its most common form, polyethyl

Q: Finding the Windows Mobile platform version When I search for System.CurrentTimeZone I get: Namespace 'System.TimeZone' contains no definition for CurrentTimeZone I found similar problem when I started a new project. I can change version to 1.1.4.0 (I think it is 4.0 client), but I want to learn which platform it is. How to find the platform version? A: This is how I found the solution: 1. Open .NET Reflector and open (Right Click) System.TimeZone.cs. 2. Find CurrentTimeZone method. 3. Open the file on the top where that method is defined. 4. Scroll down until you will see assembly name. It should be a string something like "Mobile|Client". This is important for me because I am not sure if the class is generated by tools in VS2008 (I believe it generates classes by default). I can not afford to change the version if it will cause some problems. As another note, Visual Studio 2010 generates this class by default when I create a WPF application. Q: Tracking SharePoint Usage by Users I'm looking to create a page to list user accounts and their respective logins/statuses in regards to SharePoint usage. What would be the best way to set it up, whether it be a user account that periodically updates or a group in SQL.
