Shooting with the tripod guide Guides are an important tool to have in your arsenal when you're photographing an architectural scene. You can use the guides on your tripod as a pattern, a guidepost, or a reference point to get the scene in the right spot. In Figure 3-1, I took a photo of this cabin window and grid with an on-camera tripod guide turned on and moved to the edge of the window frame. The white lines you see are the tripod guide. Figure 3-1: Guides enable you to place the camera at the correct spot. You can shoot with the grid guide turned on and set to a distance of 10 inches from the window, which means that you can place the camera anywhere within 10 inches of that spot, whether you're using one or two hands. It's great if you have more than one photographer in a scene, as it's a lot easier to position a tripod if a second person is operating it. Figure 3-2 shows the grid guide turned on and off. You can also shoot a window using one guide and then move to another window using the other guide and shoot the new window. In Figure 3-3, I used two guides, one on each side of

Fluorescence recovery of DNA released from damaged sites in living cells. Cells possess a DNA repair system which limits the damage that can be introduced into DNA during replication. Using an in situ nonenzymatic DNA 'cleavage' probe, fluorescent dyes, and confocal imaging microscopy, we can follow the course of DNA damage within the nucleus and measure the efficiency of repair. Damage to individual DNA sequences within the nucleus can be detected by treating a cell with an agent that causes a single DNA cleavage within the nucleus. DNA released from this site forms a comet-like tail which can be directly visualized. Using a tetramethylrhodamine dextran molecule as the DNA cleavage probe, the comet tail can be visualized by phase contrast microscopy, and the length of the comet tail and the number of repair cycles can be determined from the distance traveled by the DNA fragment in a given time. We have used this technique to measure the rate of repair of DNA from damaged sites in living cells. Amphotericin B-induced tumor lysis syndrome in combined immunodeficient murine host. Orthotopic bone and soft tissue sarcomas were developed in mice with severe combined immunodeficiency (scid), which are resistant to most conventional chemical agents. The normal clearance of tumor cells from the blood and the ability of the host immune system to reject the tumor cells were examined in the scid mice and in the SCID/beige/bg mice. Tumor cell lysis occurred spontaneously in the untreated SCID mice. Amphotericin B-induced lysis of tumor cells in the untreated SCID mice was comparable with that of the untreated SCID/beige/bg mice and was retarded by treatment with cyclophosphamide. It was concluded that lysis of tumor cells with amphotericin B was comparable with that of the untreated scid/beige/bg mice and could occur in the absence of an immune-mediated response. The potential for new forms of energy is often thought to be limited by technological limitations, but creative thinking and ingenuity may just open up a new era of energy possibilities. In the 1970s, for example, a U.S. company called Consolidated Edison conducted a series of experiments and developed the notion of "ozone power," which would use the light-absorbing properties of ozone to generate electricity. A potentially game-changing idea today is so-called electro-hydrogen

What's New in the Photoshop CS3?

Here's what happens when Asian-Americans form a political organization A young Asian-American activist poses for a picture with other community leaders at an event in Washington, DC. Photo courtesy of Yuri Chong. If today's Asian-American leaders had their way, their parents would be the only people allowed to reproduce in this country. That's what a small group of young Asian-American activists are aiming to change with the formation of a new political organization called RESYNC. The group wants to encourage more women, youth, and people of color to run for public office at the local and national levels. Most of the group's 20 members first started to notice the need for an organization like this around the time the 2016 presidential election happened. "It was just really scary at how many people were being elected [to Congress], but then you realized you couldn't go to them and say, 'Why don't you have a seat on the Appropriations Committee?'" said member Alexa Somavilla, a first-year graduate student at the University of Maryland. "I think that there's a lot of talk about diversity, and we've seen strides toward diversity in Congress ... but really in our community there hasn't been a whole lot of progress." Somavilla said it became clear to her that more Asian-American young people needed to run for local government seats. So she and about a dozen other people started to meet to talk about how they could encourage others to do the same. This is the second year RESYNC has been around; the first year was more of a discussion than a formal organization. That year, the goal was to start a network of young Asian-Americans who wanted to be a part of the new generation of leaders who were starting to make their voices heard. The newest generation, though, wants to be more than just organizers. They want to change the way Asian-Americans are viewed in society and politics, and they see the need for an organization that both educates and provides a platform for the next generation of candidates. Lia Hing, a sophomore at Rutgers University, is one of those people. Hing is currently interning for a nonprofit called Voto Latino in Washington, D.C., and taking a post-graduate course in public policy. She said that after the 2016 election she
