1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to a display device that displays an image in front of a user.

2. Description of the Related Art Display devices such as organic electroluminescent display devices are known as display devices that display an image in front of a user. For example, in Japanese Patent Application Publication No. 2008-134762, an organic electroluminescent display device is disclosed that can display an image in front of a user in a state where the display screen of the organic electroluminescent display device is inclined at an angle while being vertically held and facing up. However, with a structure in which the display screen is inclined at an angle with respect to the surface on which the display device is placed (hereinafter referred to as "user interface side"), with a display device such as an organic electroluminescent display device, it is not possible to view the entire display screen when the user is viewing the display screen from a position other than an edge of the display screen. In other words, when the display screen is inclined, the user is not able to visually confirm a display region in the direction of the user interface side that is other than a display region of the display screen in a direction along the vertical direction of the display screen. That is, if the display region in the direction of the user interface side is not visible to the user, it becomes difficult for the user to recognize that the display screen is inclined.

Q: Slightly worried about landing gear I'm slightly worried about landing on one wheel of my Cessna 206B. I've been flying for a little while and my instructor and I both feel like the landing gear is a little hard to retract. Is this normal? The landing gear always feels a little sticky and I feel like it doesn't move as fast as it should. Is this a sign of a problem? A: It's normal. A 172 will do pretty well on one wheel on a decent runway. A slightly shorter landing strip will require more drag. Some folks will insist your piloting skills are the issue, but I strongly disagree with that. Landing one 595f342e71
