Computer science is driving exponential technical progress. The computing power of typical desktop computer processors has increased hundreds of times over in the last 30 years. In terms of sheer computing power, computer performance is now measured in gigaflops, with around one thousand trillion operations being performed every second. However, this exponential increase in computing power over the last 30 years is due to a fundamental shift in how applications are being developed and consumed. In the past, applications have been developed and deployed independently, which meant that the applications and their environments were essentially treated as discrete, isolated units, and programmers could not take advantage of the power of parallelism, concurrency or systematised and modular software design in the design of these applications. The traditional approach to application development and consumption is to break each application down into discrete pieces, and then provide these pieces independently in the form of an API. This produces numerous, highly complex, interdependent APIs which often hide the interface complexity from the programmer. The future of application development To avoid such complexity, we have been designing and developing new applications which allow us to automate the construction of applications based upon a new and a fundamentally different approach. This new approach is based around the idea of a framework which consists of an abstract syntax of API calls, an application environment consisting of a set of services and the ability to dynamically generate application code via code generation. This approach allows us to address an issue which is the most important use-case of a computer processor; speed. A computer processor is a device which computes mathematical functions. A program cannot directly use the power of a computer processor - it must be used by the computer processor. A computer processor works by taking its inputs, processing these inputs according to some pre-defined logic, and then outputting the resulting result. As such, the time taken by a computer processor to compute an input is often a key performance factor. To fully exploit the power of a computer processor, an application must be processed as a single input. Consequently, a computer processor cannot efficiently process
