The present invention is generally directed to a method and apparatus for correcting errors in reading the information stored on a magnetic tape. More specifically, the present invention is directed to an error detection and correction method and apparatus which is applicable to magnetic tapes having a plurality of tracks as found on a video disc. In the past, one of the biggest problems in the recording of information onto magnetic tape was the magnetic stability of the tape itself. When magnetic tape was first put to use in large quantities during the late 1940's, it became apparent that the commercially available tapes were not as stable as had been hoped or expected. In those instances, particularly those where long lengths of tape were used, a satisfactory tape could not be obtained. In those instances, therefore, it was initially necessary to record a large number of copies of information at great expense. As a result, the amount of time which could be used to store information, since the material was so expensive, was severely limited and the degree of reliability of the information stored thereon was very low. To overcome these inherent drawbacks in the early magnetic tapes and discs, devices such as error correction circuits were developed. These devices generally involved the writing of a synchronization pattern of information, such as a series of pulses or sequences, in a known location on a particular track, such as on the extreme left hand side of the track, as shown in FIG. 1. This makes it possible to quickly identify at the readout the particular track from which the information is being taken by counting the number of pulses or sequences which are recorded on that particular track. Conventionally, the synchronization pattern in FIG. 1 is written on the magnetic medium, such as a magnetic tape, by an error correction device such as the magneto-optical (MO) player/recorder disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 4,006,445. This device contains a light source, an aperture, a magnetic head to write a synchronization pattern onto the tape by magnetically erasing the signal previously recorded 595f342e71
