Electrical and thermal performance of single-wall carbon nanotube (SWCNT) field-effect transistors (FETs) is improved by a low-temperature SiO2 encapsulation method. The approach results in an improvement of both charge carrier mobilities and device-to-device variations for FETs compared to prior results from oxide encapsulation methods. This low-temperature SiO2 encapsulation method may be particularly well suited for device integration, as it employs dielectric deposition compatible with complementary metal-oxide-semiconductor (CMOS) processing steps. Charge carrier mobilities observed on encapsulated SWCNT FETs show excellent reproducibility. The electrical performance of CMOS circuits constructed using encapsulated SWCNT FETs was measured; in particular, a fully functional CMOS inverter was implemented. The thermal performance of encapsulated SWCNT FETs was investigated using a two-probe method and was found to be well described by the Simmons-Stark model. This approach is an alternative to thermal treatments required by prior oxide encapsulation methods, which limits their use for application-specific CMOS integration.Recently, with the development of technology, the mounting of a memory has been realized to a small electrical device such as a mobile phone or a digital camera. The memory is mounted on such a small electrical device according to high-level functionalization, low cost, and miniaturization. Therefore, it becomes an important issue to realize high-integration of the memory that is mounted on the small electrical device. As the achievement of the high-integration of the memory, it is necessary to reduce the area for mounting the memory. It is necessary to reduce the area by a region for forming a connection terminal for connecting the memory to the external
