But here's the rub: if Ayurveda is a science, how do we define the standard and criteria? According to Ayurveda, we are all different. Like with science: there are standard procedures and processes (from verified sources of information); and standard "tests" (which are probabilistic in nature). We now know that probabilistic standards are the key to scientific credibility. But Ayurveda does not accept them. Instead, Ayurveda accepts the standard as a "Samsthan-shakya" (or reliability on the spot). Of course, science cannot accept a placebo-effect as a standard. But Ayurveda accepts it as a standard for it. So, the conclusion is: Ayurveda accepts placebo-effects as a credibility on the spot. We can stop wasting time trying to understand Ayurveda. It's all placebo-effects from an ancient yet plausible system. If science is a lie, then the well-spring of all life-giving is well-shaded. This is the key issue. If Ayurveda is a lie, then the basis of all life-giving and human existence is a lie. What would life mean if it is a lie? If Ayurveda is a lie, then I have to say that human life is a lie. engine with a 4.9L engine block casting # and with the (aorta) cam cover cast # 30468352 The car I built was the # ford of 1966, not the one of 1967. The motor for the car was not a 4.9 but a 3.4 (other small difference, looks not that much different). Have any of you build this? I use an ultrasonic bath to remove the pistons and throw them in a plastic cup of cooking oil so I can replace them one by one. I have to measure the volume of the bowl to make sure I get the piston. The old ones are always much longer (the piston goes from the port area down into the cylinder). Yes, I replaced the heads, and I'm running a punchy camshaft and larger cam bearings. That was some time ago. I've since run the heads for better flow, and I've got some of those graphite seats that smoothen the intake/exhaust. I'll be doing the exhaust later this year, and I'm installing a Cadillac valve cover, so that the valve covers won't rust.Q: What functionality is achieved by
