regurgitation was admitted to our hospital for management of an unexpected severe pulmonary hypertensive crisis. He had been treated by continuous intravenous infusion of sildenafil for 2 weeks, and he became suddenly agitated and had an episode of deep-Breathing. The blood pressure of his extremities was very low, and a pulmonary arterial pressure of 49/25 mm Hg was recorded. Immediately, we stopped the infusion and administered a vasodilator, and his blood pressure recovered completely. Since the pulmonary arterial pressure was very high, we decided to check by echocardiography whether there were any aorto-pulmonary collateral vessels, which had not been detected previously. A jet flow from the left lower pulmonary artery to the left atrium was observed through the left ventricle to the aorta. The pressure gradient between the aorta and left atrium was 40 mm Hg. We concluded that the patient had the condition called the peri-annular ventricular septal defect, which was caused
