Lipoprotein lipase (LPL) is a recently discovered and important regulatory enzyme involved in the hydrolysis of triglycerides from circulating lipoproteins. The biochemical and molecular properties of the enzyme have been characterized, and a number of anti-LPL antibodies have been prepared. The mechanism whereby LPL hydrolyzes triglycerides from lipoproteins appears to be a secondary event in the metabolism of plasma lipoproteins. The major regulation of the activity of this enzyme is achieved by the hormone-sensitive modulation of the synthesis of LPL by the liver and adipose tissue. A distinct feature of LPL is its unique ability to catalyze the hydrolysis of triglycerides from apolipoprotein B-containing lipoproteins, such as VLDL and LDL, while it does not readily hydrolyze triglycerides derived from apolipoproteins C-containing lipoproteins, such as HDL3. It is generally believed that this apparent specificity for different lipoproteins is achieved by the activity of the enzyme on the LPL molecule. It is not, however, known what sequence or sequences of the LPL molecule are responsible for the differential hydrolysis of these lipoproteins. To further characterize the specificity of LPL, we have synthesized peptides corresponding to the cleavage sites of human LPL. These peptides, derived from LPL of the human adipose tissue, have been shown to be hydrolyzed by L
