Tweet Q: What's the purpose of calling `__init__()` when instantiating a class? I'm just curious about this as I don't understand it... Why do you have to call `__init__` for each subclass of a class (i.e. `D.__init__()` if `D` is a subclass of `C`)?

Or is this something to do with object instantiation? A: Because otherwise the superclass's `__init__` will be called, which in some cases will call `__init__` which will call `__init__` for the base class `C`, which will call `__init__` for the base class `A`, etc etc. It's a strange anti-pattern for subclasses to not call the superclasses' `__init__` (or at least not the way Python dictates it)
