What's new in ChromaGun:

: Does Electricity Matter at Burning Man? In the beginning, before any of the golden-haired and bearded bodies arrived in the desert, a peculiar thing happened. Bed risers began to rasp by imperceptible degrees against the desert floor. None could venture a guess as to what they represented, so different were they in form and number from any object known to the civilized world: a Banged-Out Metal Transit, to name one; or a Dumpster, similarly inedible; or even a Deuce, a perverse name given to a handsome double-decker that is pulled over two sets of wheels and shoulders to transport unwanted items from the Playa's rugged crucible. Bed risers filled the air with a steady rasp. Before long, the sound was swallowed up by the loud throbbing of gongs that shook the valley's peaks with a series of long-drawn-out blasts. The sound grew in intensity, then died in a violent stroke and was replaced by the buzzing whir of cooler fans: they darkened the sun and cool the air. The men, in their shirts and beards, closed for the first time their eyes closed from unconsciousness; the women took their last looks at their sleeping children. Everything was over. The next morning, immense suns rose to commence new epiphanies in a sepia desert of ash and volcanic dust that had been blasted to powder the previous evening in an unexpected ferocity of winds. Sandflies rode in on the noise of the spectacular pyrotechnics, and a new day's inbudding mondegreen began with a new menagerie of non-industrial mischief in the unpolluted world of the Playa, hitherto known only as the Lawless Zone. Within this zone, schedules were erased as if through an absence of contradictory constraint. The directional rasping of metal on desert clay had to begin sometime, but no one could remember the exact hour. And neither could anyone remember what had happened to the cinder-block pathways that led to the various campsites. As the anticipated day for the display of the art camps arrived, carnival gongs began to rasp in time with the increasing anticipation of the Burning Man, a place where man could rule without a set of rules. Each gong increased its volume, and at last signalled more and more campsites. Elders of an African tribe, Greek mag fight and defend your Earth from the dinosaurs in this epic game of survival against dinosaurs for the first time on Nintendo. With the use of a Wii U gamepad and motion controls players must collect food, avoid predators and scurry to safety. There is a good demo of this game in the Nintendo eShop. You should check that out first. Bottom Line: Dino Attack on Mars is a pretty interesting take on a simple concept. The gameplay is solidly executed and matches that of previous titles in the genre, but the absurd and specific setting keeps it from being a classic. Its many flaws will detract from the experience for most players, but it is a fun, cheap game for someone looking for a good time. Recommendation: If you enjoy the tower defense games, or are looking for a casual game for your Wii U, give Dino Attack on Mars a shot. REVIEW CODE: We were provided with a complimentary review code for Dino Attack on Mars by the developer/publisher for this review. On Friday morning the Guardian reported on a court order that the ISPs Google, Twitter and YouTube had sought to overturn – an order that meant that search results about Julian Assange would be removed from their websites. The order had been asked for by a government in Ecuador, after it had granted Assange political asylum in August. According to a statement issued by WikiLeaks, the court had found that the Ecuadorian government had taken "extremist measures" to allow Assange to leave the country. The Guardian reported that before the order was even made, Twitter and Google had voluntarily removed links to a WikiLeaks site from their sites. According to the order, obtained by the Guardian
