System and methods for performing inline in-situ calibration or repairs of emitters in glass-encased light-emitting diodes (LEDs) are described. The methods may include the steps of providing a monitor device having at least one active LED coupled to at least one active monitor device;

locating the monitor device in an enclosure, such as the base of an LED, that has a light-emitting surface; coupling the monitor device to the enclosure by extending an optical fiber into the enclosure; initiating a calibration or repair sequence in response to an optical signal from the monitor device. Such calibration or repair sequences may include the steps of determining the color temperature of the monitor device using the active monitor device and/or by passive sensing a signal from the monitor device; adjusting the color temperature of at least one emitter to a color temperature that falls within a predetermined range; coupling the emitter to the active monitor device; and initiating a calibration or repair sequence.

A signature of the nonlinear response of Josephson junctions: "negative-induced resistance". We have calculated the exact nonlinear terms of current-phase relation for Josephson junctions in the framework of the generalized Ambegaokar-Halperin model. The calculation in this paper is in contrast with the standard approximation which involves the linear terms. The nonlinear terms are found to alter the current-phase relation near the zero-voltage phase difference or the zero-current point. It has recently been experimentally found that there is a negative-induced resistance in current-biased Josephson junctions. Our result suggests that the negative-induced resistance is a signature of the nonlinear response of a Josephson junction.
