The inferior olivary nucleus (ION) is part of the network of structures involved in gastric perception and regulation. Its subdivision in terms of its locations in relation to limbic, autonomic, somatic and brainstem areas, based on catecholamine-containing fibre systems, is important in understanding the nature of these reactions. However, locations have only rarely been compared with regard to the function of the nucleus. We therefore examined the whole ION in 7 dogs for catecholamine-containing fibres and looked for direct projections from the stomach. Nerve fibres containing noradrenaline and dopamine were common in the ION and formed a dense meshwork throughout the nucleus. The distribution of noradrenergic fibres was similar to that of fibres containing serotonin and tyrosine-hydroxylase. Tyrosine-hydroxylase-immunoreactive fibres, which were not part of the noradrenergic population, were rare in the ION and were not seen in a discrete region. Norepinephrine-containing fibres were often seen in the nucleus of the solitarius, the nucleus of the solitary tract, the lateral reticular nucleus and the central tegmental nucleus. Fibres were few, but there was a moderately dense plexus in the ventromedial, anterior and ventrolateral periolivary regions. Distension 6d1f23a050
