A simple Google search will unearth a multitude of different brands, suppliers and product reviews. To keep things simple there are a few basic guidelines that will help you make an informed decision. The business needs Does your business have a basic set of applications that are required for your employees to use? For example, your staff are likely to require access to: Presentation software Operating system Keyboard Monitor Network cable Wireless networking These items will form the basic requirements for your employees. However, you may also want them to be able to: Access cloud-based resources like Dropbox, for example Make phone calls Use multimedia apps File hosting Enterprise connectivity Tablets While you can purchase various combinations of hardware and software, sometimes you may be able to find common software packages as freeware. Can you access the internet? Now that you have an idea of what your business needs, you will want to check that your network is capable of providing you with the internet. Are you using a wired Ethernet network, a wireless network or both? There are no hard and fast rules, so a basic Google search for your chosen location will provide you with plenty of answers. However, if you need to be sure, it is worth approaching your network supplier. Hardware Are you a novice when it comes to hardware or have you tried your hand at the one day build-your-own PC experience? There are a number of factors to consider. Budget is essential and, if you have little experience with computers, hardware purchases could be rather daunting. The software Just because you're the only one using your computer at the moment does not mean that you can leave the configuration of your computing environment to one person - or in many cases, multiple people. If, for example, your business uses Microsoft Office, will you be happy with the set of applications that you're provided with or will you want to reconfigure it to suit your needs? Can you use a cloud service? Or do you need a local file server? These are the sorts of questions you should be asking yourself.
