To investigate the clinical characteristics of chronic lymphocytic leukemia and Richter's syndrome. Ten of 64 cases of chronic lymphocytic leukemia who transformed into Richter's syndrome were reported. The clinical data of these patients were reviewed. The median age of the patients was 59.6 years. Neoplasms were initially localized in the lymph nodes in 8 patients, in the spleen in 2 patients and in the liver in 2 patients. The bone marrow was involved in 9 patients, testis in 1 patient and the thymus in 1 patient. The median time from chronic lymphocytic leukemia diagnosis to Richter's syndrome was 13.5 months. Patients were classified into three groups according to the risk of Richter's syndrome transformation. Five (50%) of 10 patients received treatment immediately after the diagnosis of Richter's syndrome. The median survival was 42 months. Three patients died, 2 cases in the low-risk group and 1 case in the high-risk group. Richter's syndrome is an aggressive manifestation of chronic lymphocytic leukemia with poor prognosis. The risk of Richter's syndrome transformation should be taken into consideration when selecting the treatment of chronic lymphocytic leukemia.
