With the release of Lightroom version 5, imported images can now be organized by date, along with metadata, such as time and date of capture and whether the image was taken outdoors or indoors. Images can be ordered chronologically when they're displayed in the Catalog view. This is not the case in the Library view though. In the Library view, the images are shown in date order, but only those imported in 2014. If you need to get away from the site of an explosion or a fallen tree, or something that happened a few days ago or a few decades ago, you might want to buy it or borrow the book from the Library. Plugins, of course (I'm a plugin person), are also incorporated. Another improvement is in the Exposure, Sharpening and Noise reduction tools. Each can now be applied to the whole image or area as well as 32 separate areas (presets). The previously separate controls for Curves and Black Point are also available for the whole image. Correct exposures and color corrections applied to a section of the image have any changes made to the Black Point, White Point, or Gradation controls also happen to the similar settings that exist for that section of the image. You don't have to correct side-to-side if you accidentally use the same settings for the whole image and for a section of it. Colors on photos can be corrected to Photoshop's Kelvin color space which, for example, enhances the colors of a red tomato. The new control enables you to do that. The chart below shows the result on one of my photos. With warm colors, you might see a little more green than what you'd want, but overall, it's pretty cool to have the ability to correct the colors without entering other adjustments.
