Compared with the previous version of Photoshop Sketch, it's actually a better app for iPad artists, although its iOS 9 UI will be familiar to existing users of the app. It's not without its bugs, however. During my testing, I repeatedly experienced the app freezing on certain tasks and also lost the Edit file bar in certain places. The reason for the latter issue is that new edits simply disappear when you exit the app. Also, the app tends to cache rather large images. The cache can become large enough for a user to have to exit Photoshop and relaunch the app. I am seeing some of this issue with the Patch tool, where the maximum size of the cache is only 50 MB (versus 100 MB in the previous version). Thankfully, newer releases have improved this little issue. Some of the features that don't seem to function well in Sketch are: global and node masks, multiple layers, re-ordering layers, masking by color, layer gamma and curves, and smart guides. These are issues that the Photoshop team has already acknowledged and are apparently working on improving. Also, the iPad Pro has been designed to allow a lot of incremental physical edge pushing. Adobe's mantra with the iPad is "Tap. Stitch. Repeat." That means if you're pinching (or dragging), even just a few pixels, you can get a pretty good feel for where the physical edges are with the new pressure sensitive pen. Color is much more accurate now, too, with the Pencil being a magnet for captured shades. The good news is that the relationship between Adobe and Apple is going to improve dramatically. The new version of Adobe Photoshop will what they call "Optimum Performance Mode" that adapts to the available hardware. The new App is significantly faster and Adobe has made some tweaks to increase performance. The new app, in my opinion, is only about 6-8% faster than the previous version of Photoshop sketch. I also noticed a latency problem with the view on a 1990's vintage Power Mac G3/266. DYNIMAGES The G3/266 is still the fastest Power Mac many people have access to. My experience on the G3/266 is distinct from "Optimum Performance Mode" and most users. However, if your computer is not the Air or a Kaby or Air2, this performance mode is definitely going to improve your experience in Photoshop. I have found that, compared with the previous version, Photoshop now feels like a more realistic product.
