The Adobe Camera Raw (ACR) is one of the best photo Photoshop plugins currently available. It's not perfect, but it's still the best. It has improved greatly from Lightroom 2, and now it's even better. I've reviewed the changes heavily as best I could in my article for the latest Photoshop. I will say that if you're working with smaller images, the Time-based exposure settings are excellent, but they don't always do the best jobs with more extreme lighting conditions. Adobe TouchType is a more up-to-date feat of the touch typing skills of the late Dave Smith. It works just as well for point and click touch typing as it did for the desktop tool of the same name. TouchType raises the text lead by 50% and provides a very nice three-stage zoom function. Another addition is the ability to search the entire font catalogue. New so far are more simplified versions of the textured background styles of previous versions, and more traditional fonts such as Times New Roman and Courier. The new Windows version lets you convert your touch typist skills to the Mac based on the new Mac specific "swipe" interface for swiping between documents in Finder.
