Adobe brought much-anticipated automatic correction tools to Lightroom 5, giving photographers powerful and automatic tools to fix and enhance raw image files. Following three new adjustment presets, Adobe also added the ability to create new color filters and Quick Fix styles for use in the application. We are a small crew of two that loves to travel. We are the type of people that like TO DO things. So our goal to spend less time doing things and more time doing them. We travel every other month out of the year to places like Alaska, Cuba, The Poconos, New Orleans etc. We both have our on jobs, both of us work from home, one works for a memory and life insurance company and the other works for a software development company. So this means that in the morning we both need to pick up the kids from daycare, get them to school, drop their off in the afternoon. After work we are working together to finish whatever project we have been working on then we mean to relax and do other things. This is the life, and its always changing for us. So you get what our goal is in Adobe Photoshop files.... we just want to find a way to not having to do things we just don't want to do. There is no doubt that Photoshop Elements is much more capable than the standalone software. However, it's still no replacement for true RAW photo editing or suitable for a dedicated RAW editing program. The lack of Blackmagic Raw format support, extension, and output options remain a deal breaker. I keep hoping that Adobe will release a dual-app subscription model so that photographers and users can enjoy the benefits of Photoshop while avoiding the pitfalls of having Photoshop open on its own. If Fujifilm is as eager as Lightroom to support Adobe's new 7-in-one photo editing and post-processing software, you can expect to see a lot more RAW images emerging from that ecosystem. Whatever the Fujifilm RAW converter does, I find the Silkipix-based one a much cleaner way to go. Just be prepared to invest in at least a very (very!) high-powered machine to get a decent workflow up and running.

However, there are times when you need to remove or reduce the color of an adjustment to bring out detail in an area or to make some other adjustment in an area that isn't in the adjustment. Total Control allows you to convert all the color data within the adjustment layer into its own layer, subtract it from the layer above, then convert the layer back into an adjustment. Because you can remove or reduce all color data in a layer without affecting the photo's layers, you can preview and adjust the effect of the layer without affecting the rest of the image. This gives you the power to fine-tune your layer's changes without risking a lot more. To convert the layer back into an adjustment, right-click on a layer where color has been removed and choose Convert to Adjustment Layer. Then choose a color value from the text menu, and the layer will be converted back into an adjustment. Keep in mind, however, that the original color data remains in the layer.
