Effect of in vivo halothane anesthesia on the microcirculation in rat cremaster. In vivo halothane anesthesia caused a significant decline in total blood flow to the interstitium of the cremaster muscle of the rat. This decline was due mainly to a significant depression of blood flow in the capillaries and arterioles. In an attempt to discern the specific consequences of halothane anesthesia, we have studied the effect of in vivo halothane anesthesia on the following characteristics of vascular response: 1) the magnitude of vasodilation and 2) the microvascular anatomy. The data clearly show that a decrease in blood flow due to halothane anesthesia, which resembles the magnitude of blood flow reduction occurring during halothane anesthesia, does not produce any significant change in the level of vasodilation. On the other hand, halothane anesthesia decreased the total number of capillaries per unit area (to 67% of the control value) in a manner similar to the reduction in blood flow. We speculate that halothane anesthesia decreases the level of circulating angiotensin II and/or produces vasodilation at specific anatomic sites (capillaries or arterioles) in the muscle.
