Linc.. I'm honestly surprised nobody posted about this before. Marketing More than a decade ago, Ice Cube played a part in the creation of the Half-Life franchise with his album 45 Degreez. Now, some fans have found that the artist recently revisited the fictional universe with a YouTube video claiming he was "saved" by the game, and was approached by Id Software's CTO to write the theme song for the upcoming sequel. According to a report from Kotaku, on his Instagram account, Ice Cube claimed he was "Saved" by the Half-Life series. And apparently you know it was all because of the game because "real hip hop done in Half-Life is the best of the best." He also said the theme song for the sequel is due to be released later this year and wouldn't be "disrespecting" Id Software if he wanted to work with Valve again for future projects. So far, there hasn't been any official confirmation from the developer regarding the rumor, which makes it impossible to confirm, but it's certainly possible that the talented rapper could appear in another installment of the franchise. Perennial Overwatch compendium owners, rejoice: Blizzard is working on an official subscription option for the base game and other Blizzard titles, per Kotaku. The first Overwatch-themed collection will launch this summer and will include an exclusive slotted cover for the PC version. The collection is priced at $14.99 and will include all current, future and past
