Aortic valve dysfunction (AVD) may result in life-threatening aortic regurgitation. The diagnosis is confirmed by Doppler echocardiography, but it is time consuming and may lead to problems with accuracy and safety. Two-dimensional (2D) echocardiography may be used for anatomic assessment of valve area (VA) and effective orifice area (EOA), together with calculation of regurgitant fraction. Echocardiographic observations were compared with surgical findings, and 3D analysis was performed to assess reliability of echocardiographic measurements in 24 patients undergoing aortic valve replacement. Preoperative 2D and 3D measurements of EOA were shown to be accurate and reproducible and did not differ significantly. There was a significantly better correlation between Doppler and 3D measurements of EOA ( $r = 0.97$ ), and values of the correlation did not differ significantly between valve stenosis and regurgitation. 2D and 3D measurements of VA were shown to be accurate and reproducible and did not differ significantly. The correlations between preoperative 2D and Doppler and postoperative histological measurements of VA were high ( $r = 0.9$ ,  $P < 0.001$ ).
