Q: Can we start a war? Let's say there's some country X, where people in general are happy and the government is doing well. But for some reason, the Prime Minister starts a war with another country Y. Can he do it? A: The current world's politics doesn't really work that way. First of all, even though the prime minister can declare war, the actual law (the resolution passed by the parliament) requires a majority vote. Generally, this is almost impossible to get, since it usually requires something the other side is willing to do to prevent the war, like give up its nuclear weapons, or whatever else the war is about. Second, for a war to actually start, you need to have the appropriate factions and forces involved. The two countries won't just get involved without a reason. A war can easily be averted. So war is not really a decision made by a single politician. There must be a big enough (and independent) reason for the war to actually happen. # -- coding: utf-8 -- from __future__ import absolute_import, print_function, unicode_literals import time from. import __utils __unicode__ = __utils.__unicode__ __all__ = ['get_time', 'get_time_ms'] def get_time(datetime=True): """ Calculate current time and date. Parameters ---------- datetime : {True, False}, default = True If `True` the calculation will return the time and date in RFC 2445 format. Returns ------- datetime : :class:`.Datetime` or :class:`.Timestamp` Current datetime object or timestamp. Examples -------- >>> datetime = get_time() >>> datetime.tzinfo is not None True >>>
