I'm really impressed by my new experience with photoshop so far and I'm trying all the studio free apps to learn them, and it's been working great, it's just like Adobe says nothing else can do what Photoshop does. I'm having trouble with CS6 though, I have many issues with moving layers into the Layer group, and the more I tweak and work on the more it crashes while I'm trying to do it. This is NOT a coincidence, as I've done the same in the past and there was not one error message. I'm hoping it's just a fluke, but it happens too often.

Many people don't know about this feature, which is an essential tool for editing images. The most common use of the layer mask is to hide an area of your image, to display only what you want. Once a layer mask is applied to an image, it can be any shape, color, or even a path. When you're adding or removing objects or editing color, you can mask an area while working on the rest of the image. To select your area, go to the layer mask palette and your area will appear as a black mask. You can change the opacity of the area using the mask opacity setting, or you can use the Solid Color, Alpha Channel, Hue/Saturation, or Layers options. The Channel Mixer can be used to create new channels for a new type of image, or simply to mix layers in a single image. It allows you to pick two layers, create a new alpha channel, or blend two images. It is primarily used to mix an image with or without a layer mask. It helps in creating true-to-life images. In addition, it is used to create a new image for images that would be impossible to capture officially in front of the background they would be covering. For example, when the Image is too large, or in the case of some kinds of images, you may not have the freedom to move a subject out of the way. For this reason the Channel Mixer is used to separate the foreground and background, or to make an image fit more. Among the major features of Photoshop, Content Aware Fill is the one that is mighty fine. It can fill different spots in an image with just one tool. The program can be used to detect and replace similar background colors. It also allows you to replace different areas with the same background color.
