Gone is the new tag view that was found in Lightroom 4 and has been replaced by Smart Previews. The way it works is there is still a metadata tag called a tag set, but instead of an icon to tell you each photo has a tag set in the Smart Preview view, now there's a little thumbnail in the Toolbar. Much like the icons you've long recognized in the preview displays in Lightroom, you can click on certain thumbnails and view the tag set for that photo. In the old view, only the first 100 tag sets were shown, but the new view allows you to scroll through all the tag sets and view all of the images within them. I found this view much more useful than the old one, because it's easier to get an overview of all the tags applied to the image. The old view was also useful because you could click on the thumbnail and jump to that photo in the catalog, but in the new view you just jump to the image directly, eliminating that extra step. Unfortunately, in the new version of the software, the new tag set display is currently only available in the new Smart Previews views (Tools, Library, or Develop) and some different catalog settings (namely, the Size column in the catalog view).

The biggest change in Lightroom 6 is the new tag sets display.
